

WORLD

SEE The Coming World: Ecology as the New Politics 2030–2100, at Moscow’s Garage Museum of Contemporary Art, envisions what the world might look like if oil resources were exhausted or human life expanded beyond the earth. Over 50 artists weigh in, including John Akomfrah (right, a still from his video installation Purple) and Maurizio Cattelan. (garagemca.org; through December 1)

SHOP A new crop of superchic maternity brands has won over fans—whether they’re expecting or not. Leading the pack is newcomer Tellus Mater, offering faux-leather pants and billowy pleated dresses. (Juno dress, $800, tellusmaternyc.com)

WATCH This summer, Aladdin star Mena Massoud will show you a whole new plant-based world. He’s taking his company, Evolving Vegan, on the road, visiting cafés and chatting with experts about how small changes can help our planet. (See the episodes on IGTV @evolvingvegan.) “We’re trying to make plant-based living more accessible,” says the Egyptian Canadian actor. He’s currently at work on a cookbook and has a starring role in the upcoming Hulu series Reprisal. For now, try EV’s vegan truffles, available through The Dirty Cookie.

SHOP Committed to developing new sustainable materials, designer Maggie Marilyn recently debuted a silk alternative made from rose petals for her prefall collection (below). Up next for the New Zealand talent: expanding her audience with an exclusive capsule created for Net-a-Porter’s new Sustainable Edit, which launched this June and features the work of over 20 eco-minded brands, including Veja, ELV, and Hereu.
